La. producers spared major damage from cool weather

Early reports indicate Louisiana producers escaped major damage from the unseasonably cold temperatures over the Easter weekend, Agriculture and Forestry Commissioner Bob Odom reported today.

"Other Southern states are reporting significant damage to fruit crops like peaches and blueberries, but the Louisiana growers I've spoken to made it through OK," Odom said. "The overnight temperatures didn't get quite as low as expected which left us in relatively good shape. We're receiving some much-needed rain and overall our producers are doing well."

Joe Mitcham, a peach grower in Lincoln Parish, said the temperature at his orchards reached 36 degrees – not low enough to damage his young fruit.

"It has to be around 30 degrees to cause any significant damage," Mitcham explained. "I think we will have a good crop when we begin harvesting in late May. We had plenty of chill hours in the winter when we needed them."

Mitcham said precipitation, or a lack of it, is what will make or break his crop this year.

"It is extremely dry for this time of the year. That could affect the overall size of the peaches when we do start to harvest them," Mitcham added.

The parishes in north-central Louisiana are about six inches below normal rainfall for the year.

Anthony Liuzza, a strawberry producer in Tangipahoa Parish where the annual Strawberry Festival is held, said the berry crop is in good shape.

"My concern is that consumers buy fresh berries grown in Louisiana," Liuzza said.

Liuzza said some commercial vegetables grown in the Florida Parishes were slightly affected by the cold weather.

"The cold north wind scorched the tomato and pepper stalks a little, burnt a few leaves. But I think they are young enough they will grow out of it and everything will be fine," Liuzza noted.

Ray Young, who grows 700 acres of corn south of Winnsboro, said his corn crop sustained light damage from last Friday night's frost.

"The damage in the light colored soils is worse, but I think overall damage will be minor and won't result in any yield loss," Young said. "The fields are yellow and not looking too good but they will survive."

Young said fields should gradually improve during the coming week. He also grows wheat and reported no damage to that crop.

"The weather guys got us prepared for what could have been a really bad Easter weekend for farmers in Louisiana," Odom said. "In the end, other states took the brunt of the arctic blast and we dodged the bullet."
